Acknowledgments

Many thanks go to all of the Red Wolf SSP[®] cooperators and Point Defiance Zoo & Aquarium staff for their dedicated commitment to the red wolf recovery program. Also to our SPMAG Advisor, Randy Fulk, North Carolina Zoo and Sarah Long with the AZA Population Management Center, Lincoln Park Zoo. To the U. S. Fish and Wildlife Service project personnel for providing their expertise and support over the years. To Dale Pedersen and John Annon for their immeasurable contributions to the Red Wolf Recovery Program and Ron Stark for his artwork. Finally, continued thanks to Sue Behrns for her tireless efforts in all that she has done for red wolves.

Introduction

The red wolf (Canis rufus) was listed as endangered under the Endangered Species Preservation Act of 1966 and was one of the first endangered species to attract recovery attention by the U. S. Fish and Wildlife Service (Service) following the passage of the Endangered Species Act on December 28, 1973 (USFWS 1990). Concurrent with initiating the recovery program, a captive-breeding/certification program was organized through a cooperative agreement between the Service and the Metropolitan Park District of Tacoma at the Point Defiance Zoo & Aquarium (PDZA) in Tacoma, Washington. By mid-1975 it became apparent that the only way the red wolf could be saved from extinction was to capture as many wild animals as possible and place them in a secured captive-breeding program. Accordingly, program officials identified three objectives of the captive breeding program: 1) Certify the genetic purity of wild-caught wolves; 2) increase the number of genetically pure red wolves in captivity; and 3) maintain a continuing red wolf gene pool for re-establishment of the species in the wild and for distribution to selected zoos (USFWS 1984).

The American Zoo and Aquarium Association approved the red wolf for Species Survival Plan (SSP) designation in 1984. At that time there were four facilities outside PDZA and a total population of 63 red wolves. As captive husbandry techniques improved and with the population reasonably secure through increased reproduction, preparations were progressing to initiate a reintroduction project at the Alligator River National Wildlife Refuge (ARNWR) in northeastern North Carolina (NENC). This historic first attempt to restore a carnivore species considered extinct in its former range generated tremendous interest in recovery of the species (Phillips et al. 1995). The zoological community demonstrated their support for the recovery program through commitment and cooperation. From 1987 through 1991, an additional 19 facilities became participants in the Red Wolf SSP.

A Population Habitat and Viability Assessment (PHVA) conducted in April 1999 by the Conservation Breeding Specialist Group of the IUCN's Species Survival Commission, was organized by the Service to review program information and address technical issues facing red wolf recovery. While the role of the RWSSP has evolved over the course of the recovery program, workshop participants agreed that the RWSSP remains a vital part of long-term management for recovery of the species (Kelly et al. 2000).

Thirty-five approved institutions participating in the RWSSP. Additionally, captive facilities managed by the Service occur at one mainland reintroduction site (Sandy Ridge at the ARNWR), two island propagation projects (Cape Romain NWR, SC and St. Vincent Island, FL), and North Carolina State University. As of August 1, 2003, these locations manage a captive population of 158 (79.79) wolves.

Red Wolf Overview

Status and Distribution in the Wild

McCarley (1959, 1962) was the first to suggest to the scientific community that the red wolf was in danger of extinction. The combination of several factors contributed to the red wolf's demise including heavy parasite infestation, predator control programs, and loss of habitat forcing the remaining red wolves into a situation where interbreeding with an expanding coyote population occurred (Carley 1975). These circumstances required program officials to redirect the objective from one of local preservation to planned removal of all the red wolves in the wild (USFWS 1990). While it was clear that this decision was indeed extreme, the removal of the last red wolves from the wild could only be justified through the development of a long-range objective to eventually return the species to areas of its native range.

A study by Nowak (2002) catalogued and reassessed all available historical, fossil and archaeological specimens associated to the red wolf. Preliminary information from this study suggests that the red wolf historical range may be modified to include the entire forested region of eastern North America from Maine to the Gulf Coast. Field-work confirmed that the red wolf's final range was restricted to the coastal prairies and marshes of extreme southeastern Texas and southwestern Louisiana (Pimlott and Joslin 1968, Carley 1979, McCarley and Carley 1979). Distribution of free-ranging wolves at the end of the reporting period occurs in one experimental population area at NENC and two island propagation sites managed by the Service as part of the recovery program to provide wolves for release on the mainland. The Service and the IUCN list the red wolf as endangered.

Northeastern North Carolina Reintroduction

The first mainland restoration project began in 1987 in NENC at the ARNWR. Red wolves currently reside over about 1.5 million acres throughout the experimental population area, which includes three national wildlife refuges, a department of defense bombing range, state lands, and private land. As of 1 August 2003, an estimated 100 red wolves are free ranging in NENC with all but two wild born.

By the mid 1990s, coyote had moved into NENC and was once again threatening red wolf survival. It was clear from the April 1999 PHVA that the immediate and long-term threat of hybridization between red wolves and coyotes is the most significant issue affecting red wolf recovery (Kelly et al. 1999). Subsequently, an adaptive management plan was developed to guide management activities and designed to expand the red wolf population from east to west, while minimizing or eliminating the occurrence of hybrid litters throughout the experimental population area. A combination of genetic (blood and fecal), pedigree and morphometric assessment guide field crew protocols to aid in monitoring, identification, and home range/habitat usage of free ranging canids within the experimental population area (Adams et al 2003, Miller et al. 2003). Examples of additional management activities employed to advance recovery objectives include removing coyotes/hybrids and/or sterilization and release of coyotes/hybrids to serve as placeholders until wolf pairs are established through natural events (e.g., displacement) or direct management actions (e.g., inserting sub-adult wolves via island propagation sites). A recent management strategy involved fostering pups from a captive litter to a wild litter has shown initial success and could provide significant conservation application for recovery efforts in the future. (Waddell et al. 2002).

With termination of the red wolf restoration project in the Great Smoky Mountains National Park in October 1998 (Waddell, 1999), the NENC experimental population area is the only active project on the mainland. Investigating another restoration site on the mainland has been halted until the Service gains enough knowledge to determine whether the red wolf's genetic integrity can be maintained in the wild. However, in the four years since the adaptive management plan has been applied, great progress has been made in reducing the occurrence of hybrid litters and building the world's only wild red wolf population.

Island Propagation Projects

The primary purpose of the island projects is to give wolves some wild experience and ideally to produce offspring for eventual insertion at the mainland site. (Henry and Lucash 1998). At the end of the reporting period, free-ranging wolves inhabited two island propagation projects located at the Cape Romain NWR on Bulls Island, South Carolina and St. Vincent Island NWR, Florida. Pairs on the islands are evaluated annually to determine if changes in the pairs are needed based on age of individuals, health status and reproductive success, compatibility and behavior. The islands fulfill an increasingly important role in providing wild-born wolves that are funneled to NENC from the captive program.

Red Wolf Ecology

Home range and habitat requirements can vary according to site-specific variables such as prey abundance, terrain, and available cover. Home ranges have been estimated from 20 - 156 km² (Carley 1975, Shaw 1975, Lucash and Crawford 1993, Phillips et al. 1995). Red wolves prefer habitat typified by forest margins, which allow access to vegetative cover and adjacent fields and pastures. Travel routes that permit unrestricted movements from cover to adjacent open areas include dirt roads, earthen levees, drainages, etc. Red wolves are primarily nocturnal in their movements with Carley (1975) and Shaw (1975) noting a tendency toward diurnal activity during winter months.

Scat analysis from areas where red wolves have been reintroduced show prey items consisting primarily of white-tailed deer (Odocoileus virginianus) and raccoon (Procyon lotor) (Lucash and Crawford 1993, Kelly 1994). Accounts by Stutzenbaker (1968), Russell and Shaw (1971), Riley and McBride (1972), and Shaw (1975) show that many of the common prey species utilized by wild canids in southeast Texas and southwest Louisiana are also observed in red wolf samples collected recently. Red wolves will prey on livestock where livestock management practices present the wolves with an easy opportunity to take calves or other small farm animals (USFWS 1984, Lucash and Crawford 1993).

Field studies conducted in the 1970's demonstrated that red wolves are social and will travel in family groups (Carley 1979), though single wolves (dispersers) are not uncommon. Current field data also supports the social nature of red wolves (Phillips and Henry 1992, Nowak et al. 1995, Morse 1996). The number and composition of a family group can vary according to their location, available habitat and food, and time of year.

Carley (1979) indicated that the “strength” of pair bonding in mated red wolves in their final range is not known. However, he noted that wild caught adult wolves, thought to be naturally mated pairs due to circumstances of their capture, had remained together following translocation. According to annual summaries of the current free-ranging population, the relationship of paired red wolves demonstrates that a solid pair bond is evident. Sites offering some form of security principally characterize den selection in the wild, though preferred locations are not specific. Hollow tree trunks, stream banks, rock outcroppings, grass nests or depressions, culverts, drainage and irrigation ditches are examples that appear to fulfill den requirements.

Red wolves are seasonally monestrous, breeding from February through March. Gestation lasts 60 - 63 days with pups being born in April or May. Average litter size is four to five pups with Nowak (1972) noting one litter of twelve. The earliest birth date reported in the captive program is April 4 with the latest occurring on May 21. Some captive born females have successfully whelped during their first “season”, however it is generally accepted that female red wolves are not reproductively viable until their second season, at approximately 21 months of age. Captive born males have successfully bred during their third breeding season, at approximately 31 months of age. Viable sperm has been collected via electro-ejaculation from males as early as 24 months of age and on at least two occasions; 21-month-old males have produced litters in the wild (Henry et al. 1995).

The life span of wild red wolves in the harsh coastal environment of their final range is estimated at four years with a few judged to be seven or eight years of age (Carley 1979). Red wolves in captivity have lived for 15 years. Mortality factors found to be significant in the reintroduced population include vehicle strikes, drowning, and intraspecific mortalities. Illegal taking such as gunshot represents a troublesome cause of death that has occurred, albeit infrequently, in recent years. Other mortality factors such as choking to death on food and disease or parasite related factors have been recorded. Three wolves (two adults and one pup) have been killed by alligators (Alligator mississippiensis) at Bulls Island, SC with one confirmed and one suspected death due to similar circumstances occurring at St. Vincent Island, FL.

Taxonomy

In his response to two petitions to delist the red wolf from endangered species protection, Henry (1992, 1997) provides a thorough review of red wolf taxonomy including relevant historic and contemporary literature. These petitions were based on the contention that the red wolf is of hybrid origin resulting from interbreeding between gray wolves C. lupus and coyotes C. latrans.

Disputes and interpretation about the red wolf's origin and taxonomic position have not diminished (Nowak and Federoff 1996; Roy et al. 1996; Nowak 1998; Reich et al. 1999; Nowak 2000). Some analyses of mitochondrial and nuclear DNA have suggested a hybrid origin (C. lupus x C. latrans) for the red wolf (Wayne and Jenks 1991; Roy et al. 1996; Reich et al. 1999). It has also been proposed (Lawrence and Bossert 1967) that rufus may have intergraded with the gray wolf subspecies C. lupus lycaon of southeastern Canada and that the red wolf should be considered a subspecies of C. lupus. Recent genetic studies of C. l. lycaon (Wilson et al. 2000) mainly from the vicinity of Algonquin Provincial Park in southeastern Ontario, indicate an affinity to rufus. They suggest that these two taxa represent a line of eastern wolf that developed in North America separately from C. lupus, which evolved in Eurasia, and should therefore be combined as a separate species, i.e., C. lycaon with rufus designated as a subspecies of this eastern wolf complex. However, an examination of all available cranial material of eastern North American wild Canis by Nowak (2000) retains species designation for the red wolf and that C. l. lycaon represents a natural hybrid event that occurred between rufus and lupus.

While the question of the taxonomic status of the red wolf remains open, Dowling et al. (1992) advise that all available data including morphology, behavior, ecology, ontogeny, paleontology, etc. must be considered with regard to the question. The approach adopted and maintained by the Service is stated by Henry (1997) as follows:

“At present, mammalian systematists have not changed the red wolf’s taxonomic status as a species. It is incumbent upon the Service to avoid a possibly premature and unwarranted removal or relaxation of protection for a listed species. Given the current “state of the art” of DNA analysis and interpretation in wild canids, the Service must adopt a conservative approach in the absence of other substantial data supporting delisting of the red wolf.”

Data Conventions

At the beginning of the red wolf program, as canids were being sorted out in the field and the captive population was being established, all animals that entered the captive-breeding program were given a studbook number. Previous historical studbook publications included all animals assigned a studbook number but did not distinguish an animal in the studbook as a hybrid or not. Known hybrids were excluded from analysis used to generate the Recovery/SSP Plan (USFWS 1990) and subsequent master plan analysis. The captive populations demographic and genetic summary from the recent master plan meeting held at the Wild Canid Center, Eureka, MO in July 2003 is included below.

This studbook differentiates red wolves from hybrids through a user-defined-field (UDF). This has been done for several reasons. First is to make the studbook a document that is as complete as possible. Second is in an attempt to clear up confusion about animals' entering the captive-breeding program that met the standards developed for the red wolf but through the captive breeding process, were determined not to be red wolves. Founders are listed below. Two of these founder lines (SB# 17 & 30) have been lost as no living descendants are represented in the current population. However, sperm from SB# 17's last living descendant (SB# 255) has been preserved so the potential exists to "resurrect" this founder line by artificial insemination. There were also four individuals (SB#s 10, 21, 22, 31) that were thought to be red wolves, but because they did not reproduce, a final determination could not be made. Finally UDF's have been included to record the current free ranging population as wolf or hybrid when verified by genetic testing.

Scope: The database is considered current as of 1 August 2003, although additional wild born wolves from 2003 that have not been trapped will be assigned studbook numbers when processed.

Studbook #: Lists all animals that have entered the program and have been assigned a studbook numbers chronologically by date of birth, or in the case of wild-caught and wild-born animals, estimated date of birth.

Sex: “F” — Female; “M” — Male; “?” — Unknown

Date: All dates listed as DD/MM/YY. “~” indicates estimated date.

Sire/Dam: By studbook number if known. WILD if an animal is wild-caught and therefore may be a founder. UNK if parental identity is not known.

Locations: Listed by SPARKS mnemonic.

Local ID: Identification reported by the holding institution if known.

Event: Management activities in an animals lifetime.

UDF: User defined field

- Capfree – captive “C” or free-ranging “F” as of reporting date or at time of death.
- Hybrid – animal determined to be hybrid “Y” or not “N”. Animals designated by a “U” indicate that an individual has not been genetically tested, that one or both parents are unknown or that one or both parents are known but have not been genetically tested.
